behavior that we call crimes, I'm talking about people who are going to be locked up for these humongous sentences when there is no justification, no penological justification for it. And some people think if somebody's once convicted of a crime, there is no injustice you can commit against them, no matter how you treat them. I don't feel that way. I will never feel that way. But here's the strategy, Senator Maurstad. We're going to run into Russia and we know the winter is coming. We don't have any carts or trucks carrying food, Senator Engel. Each soldier has got a little bitty pink bag with a ribbon tied around it that's got some jelly beans and a doughnut in it. Now, we're going to run into Russia and whip Russia. We're at war and the winter is about to start, and we're going to forget the lessons of history, those that Napoleon learned, those that Hitler learned, and realize that if you run into Russia in the wintertime, you're not going to win. And they didn't win. So now, this Legislature says, I like that tactic. What I think I'm going to do is run into Russia in the wintertime with my little bag of jelly beans and a doughnut and I'm going to whip Russia. You know why I draw the comparison? You can look at California. They couldn't build their way out. Illinois couldn't. Michigan couldn't. Florida couldn't. Big states. New York, they couldn't do it. They went into Russia in the wintertime and they were decimated. So here comes Nebraska. These intelligent people. We got people on the Appropriations Committee who ought to read something other than these numbers that have been crunched for them. Don't read a lot of history, just read a little bit of history, and don't read about Russia and the Germans, Russia and Napoleon. That is too complicated. Read about these states who've tried to build their way out of this problem and you'll come into an area that you feel comfortable with. You will see numbers, Senator Vrtiska, staggering numbers. And I know you're not a members of the Appropriations Committee but you're looking at me as I swivel my head less than that 180 degrees from the mike that I can do on the floor and still be heard through the mike. You will see these huge amounts of money that these states have expended. Senator Wehrbein would probably just sit back and just be delighted, and then when he got to the end, he would see that after the expenditure of all this money, the problem is not solved. As they say about these over-the-counter medications, if the symptom persists or grows unusually severe, see your doctor.
